The great ergument against the power of a Territory to exclude property in elaves is, that a Territory to exclude property in elaves is, that a Territory is bought by the common bloed and treasure, and that a citizen of any State has a right, by the common interest his State has in the Territory, to take any species of property he possesses into the Territory. The argument is plausible; but if it were sound, it can he npplied with as much force to the new State as to a Territory.

Lou. Democrat.

This is not "the great argument against the power of a Territory to exclude property in elaves," though it is a most weighty consideration in support of the great argument, which is, we presume to say, that the exclusion or aholition of property in elaves is an act of sovereignty, whereas a Territory is not a sovereign power. This is the great argument against the power in question, striking directly at the point of constitutionality, whilst the argument to which our neighbor dextrously assigns the procedence touchas the point of justice alone, which, though a powerful auxiliary in legal dispates, might he a very poworless principal. What the Constitution clearly sauctions must be oboyed, until it is lawfully changed, justice or no justice. So far as the positive affairs of government are concerned, then, these provisions are perfectly nugatory; for, under the forms of society, when it comes to the determination of what is right or wrong, there to the determination of what is right or wrong, there is absolutely no appeal from the sovereign power. The truth of this is "elf-evident. If, however, can excessively Democretic neighbor is disposed to controvert it, as may very possibly happen since he appears to cherish a special malice towards relf-evident truths, we beg him to begin or end his argument by just specifying the power to which in his opinion the citizan may appeal from the defermination of the state.
